Mr. Cartwright said he had accused Sir Hugh Allan of gross ingratitude in conspiring against the Government.

Hon. Mr. Tilley raid that he knew of no subsidies that Sir Hugh Allan had received of any great importance, except that under the contract for the ocean mail service which was made many years ago. Before Confederation that subsidy was four times more than it was It was sustained not only by Parliament and the present leader of the Government, but by when he looked at the policy of the Opposi-tion with regard to developing the country he did not feel surprised that Sir Hugh Allan supported the party that would carry on the work. He believed that neither the Government nor any member sold, or had any in-tentions, or gave to Sir Hugh Allan sud his company privileges which they would not have given to any other company. Under these o nvictions he stood there to defend the Administration with a consciousness of rec-titude of their conduct, and one that might be vibdicated. He then touched upon the de vindicated. He then touched upon the question of election expenses, legitimate and corrupt, and said the reception of money for election purposes either by leading members of the Opposition, who naturally expected to be in power, was an error, because if a party received money from one of the latter, he
